Impaired regeneration of a neuroma in the rat. Chronic neuropathic pain after peripheral nerve injury is associated with impaired dorsal horn axon regeneration. The aim of the present study was to quantify axon regeneration in vivo in a peripheral nerve model of chronic neuropathic pain. In a model of chronic rat neuropathic pain 7.5-mm tibial and 5.5-mm common peroneal nerve injuries were performed using either epineurial or microsurgical techniques with or without sural nerve transection. The degree of axon regeneration was assessed at different time-points by the degeneration-regeneration index (DRI), which is defined as the ratio between the number of degenerating axons and the number of regenerating axons in the same region. In animals with nerve injury, the DRI decreased from 1.52 +/- 0.06 (mean +/- SEM) 3 months after injury to 0.99 +/- 0.05 5 months after injury, although the number of regenerating axons was stable over time. The difference in DRI between epineurial and microsurgical injuries was maintained for 1 month after injury, although at 3 months the epineurial group had recovered and the mean axon regeneration ratio was 1.27 +/- 0.11. In animals with nerve injury and sural nerve transection, the DRI did not differ from controls. These findings suggest that the capacity of regenerating nerve fibers to reinnervate dorsal horn neurons is diminished in a model of chronic pain and that this diminution is independent of whether the injury is in the sural nerve or the periphery of the nerve. 04aeff104c
