The usual suspects are there ... Custom Brush, Content-Aware Fill, Liquify, Create Vector Mask ... As Lightroom and other photo apps have been adding layers on layers, taking things into 3D, etc., along the way, Adobe has engaged in those as well. Filters (non 3D) actually now show up in a separate utility window, accessible from the top of the menu bar. The filters are mostly a back-to-basics set of general filters. An ability to customize that is overdue. However, something has changed. When I point the Capture Tool (lens) to a single face in an image, it no longer displays a preview. The preview window no longer shows up when I point the Capture Tool to a selected area within an image. I need both, of course — preview when nothing is selected, and capture when I have selected something in the photo. The big news in Photoshop is the addition of the Photomerge feature, a totally revamped Photoshop Sketch, and a couple other Photoshop changes. Photoshop Sketch's capabilities are built into the native camera app on the iPad. However, we suppose one could plug the pen into any computer and use the built-in multitouch gestures to add and create. The workflow is so similar to one's Photoshop workflow, however, that it's just about seamless to use. The big news with the Canon camera app/lens, in fact, is that you can now sync images directly off your iPhone or iPad and the remaining catalog to the desktop version of the program directly through Wi-Fi. The only drawback is that if you're working on the iPad, you can only sync items that are rated 1+ because of the iOS restrictions. You can view a photo on your phone, tap to move it to your desktop version, and the photo will automatically show up on your desktop if it's a good image. Syncing lists is also much improved in this version. Syncing can be done directly from the camera app or from the personalized photo stream. The latter has been updated with the event tools and new filters, and my uni-lenses and uni-focal lengths are up-to-date. Syncs are far more reliable now as well. Many people have successfully synced dozens of images. Syncs from the camera app are also synced across platforms - iPhone, iPad, and desktop - and syncs from iCloud are often an option if not enabled by preference.
